

Diploma thesis “Integration of foreigners in the second generation (coexistence of Vietnamese and Czech families in Cheb) deals with the current situation in the issue of the integration of foreigners in the Czech Republic, which is mostly displayed in the way of living of the second generation. The thesis is specifically focused on Vietnamese immigrants, who first had come to Czech because of work during the communism and returned back and started not only working, but also started family and having children after the revolution in 1989. Nowadays Vietnamese form one of the biggest groups of migrants in CR, what significantly influences the situation especially in the westbohemian region, where the group had been concentrated because of economic reasons.

While using theoretical knowledge of the situation, methods of policy analysis (causal model, SWOT analysis) and sociological research (semi-structured interviews, questionnaires and observation) the goal of the thesis was to describe the situation of the second generation, what problems are dealt within the situation, what is the attitude of the society towards them and vice versa.

According to this description the thesis deals with the evaluation of the integration approach of public policy and suggests precautions that would improve the situation in the matter of the issue that should be given more attention in other research and that creates – in the future - certain opportunities for example in adjusting of the second Vietnamese generation to the Czech culture and their motivation in tertiary education, as well as threats coming from a certain closeness of the community and current attitude of the major society which could be sometimes xenophobic.
