Diploma thesis "Analysis of labour migration in the Czech Republic after admission to the European union." deals with europe labour migration in the Czech Republic in connection with impacts of Czech Republic admission to the Europe union and simultaneosly the paper deals with labour migration of Czech citizens to the European countries. This research discovers the main processes connected with the integration of the Czech labour market into the structure of the European Union, and to analyse the impacts that this integration has had in the field of work migration. Particular attention is given to the migration of workers from the Czech Republic to the other member states of the EU (specifically Ireland), the target of which is to give evidence that the transition period which is applied to the Czech Republic is not legitimate. There is also a focus on the developments in the employment of Czech people in the Irish labour market and the opinions that Irish people have of the migration of foreign workers to their country (with particular focus on their attitudes towards Czech people). The potential of the migration of Czech workers is analyse in other part of the research. In the last chapter the focus is on the developments in the Czech labour market in its employment of workers from the European Union. The changes for the European workers, since the accession of the Czech Republic to the European Union, are described in this chapter. The analysis of the labour migration of EU workers to the Czech Republic is developed upon and it is assisted by author's research done among workers from the European Union who are working in the Czech Republic.
