

The thesis describes use of the medium of fire in Czech action art from the 1960s to 1980s, with overlap to more recent years. A typology of those functions is created that fire in action art may assume. Czech works are put in the context of West European and American art, and possible meanings connected with fire in these works are suggested.