

Unconditional imprisonment

The main purpose of this thesis is to evaluate the current legislation of the unconditional imprisonment and its application in practise. The author focuses predominantly on the treatment program for sentenced persons and the ways to apply discipline in prison.

In the first chapter the author pursues the theoretical definition of punishment and the position of unconditional prison sentences in the system of other punishments. The focus is also on the development of penological systems during the past two centuries.

The second chapter describes the system of Czech prisons assigning prisoners to various types of prisons and the first days after taking a prisoner to a detention center. This chapter is the introduction to the course of compiling a comprehensive report on the conviction.

Third and main chapter is devoted to the treatment program and its individual components, ie. work activities, including the current problems of this area, further education, special educational and special interest activities and shaping the field of external relations. The author discusses not only the statutory definition of these components, but also gives practical examples from various prisons. Finally, this chapter focuses on the evaluation of treatment of prisoners and redeployment to other types of prisons or in pervious groups of internal differentiation.

In the penultimate chapter, the author brings the issue of disciplinary measures in prison, including individual funds and the procedure for storing by various prison personnel.

The last chapter, entitled Treatment Program in Prison Pilsen then presents insight into the practical realization of the individual components of the treatment program in one of the prisons in the Czech Republic.

In its conclusion, the author points out the problems that exist in the current prison system in the Czech Republic, ie. overcrowding, low employment rates of prisoners and lack of skilled personnel.

The whole work is finished by a concrete example of a comprehensive report on the conviction, treatment programs and their evaluation, provided by the prison staff in Pilsen.