

Abstract

This bachelor writing is focused on analysis and comparison of economic transformation process of three central european countries. These selected countries – Czech republic, Hungary and Poland – have comparable starting conditions. The aim of the thesis is not only a general description of theoretical difficulties connected with the transformation process in the economical realm (and partially also in the political and institucional realm), but also to discover similarities or dissimilarities during the development of these economics. The analysis and comparison is performed mainly with the best known and the most used macroeconomic indicators. The conclusion includes an over-all summary of the transformation process up to now.
