

This work attends to conclusion of the excavations on the western shore of the Crimean peninsula which are concerned to the greek agricultural settlements in this area. On one hand it includes the city of Chersonesos, modern Sevastopol, and its adjacent surroundings covered by land – plots of the same size. This area represents the nearer chora of the city. This work also deal with the areas, which were adjected to Chersonesos during its expansion to the N and NW coast of the peninsula. This territory, including Kerkintis and Kalos Limen, represents the distant chora of the city of Chersonesos. The plotting is very important too and it will be included to the work as well. The researches of the individual farms can provide us an image of life of its inhabitants. As the work covers also agriculture and arable crops, it will include the results of paleobotanical researches too.
