

This thesis describes the fascist movement in Czechoslovakia in the interwar period. The main emphasis is on organizational and program fragmentation of Národní obec fašistická and its predecessors. In the text we can find other organizations connected with the fascism and their development and activities are explored. Gen. Radola Gajda as the main person of fascist movement is described and other important persons are mentioned too.

The objective of this text is finding the reasons of the failure of Czech fascists. These reasons can be found at the fascists themselves.
