

The thesis investigates the search for dimension reduction subspace for the Poisson point process driven by a Gaussian random field. The work describes the method called sliced inverse regression, which is applied to a point process driven by random field. Its functionality in mentioned context is then proved. This method is in several ways implemented and tested in R software environment on random data. The individual implementations are described and results are then compared with each other.