

This work concerns the topic of family policy at the level of local communities in the Czech Republic in recent years from demographic view. After summarizing the basic data and the literature used in this work is this work focused on the introduction to the problems of family policy, especially at the regional level, in terms of its definition, objectives, actors, tools and so on. The work is dedicated to outlining and evaluating the state of family policy at the level of local communities and based on the selected municipalities provides good practice examples. The work also focuses on the fertility of these communities between 1996 and 2010. The final section attempts on the basis of the results obtained to draw some recommendations for the implementation of family policy at the municipal level.