Financial data often take the form of time series. In such cases, their analysis is performed using statistical methods for time series. The thesis describes selected parametric and nonparametric tests of random walk hypothesis. Tests are designed against common mutual correlation alternatives but also against trend and cyclic data structure alternatives. The thesis provides the theoretical basis of these tests and their application to real financial data.