

For the given Poisson's equation, we use the finite element method to find an approximate solution. According to the theory of the finite element method, we construct in a certain Sobolev space a finite dimensional subspace; unlike the classical approach, we generate the subspace using a basis of splines. The solution in the subspace approximates both the function and its derivative. This makes the approximation more accurate.