

This thesis focuses on the complex of medieval mural paintings in the church of St. James the Greater in Libis. It concerns the extant paintings, which are described, explained and compared to analogical works. The thesis turns its attention also to fragments of original paintings for the first time. It deeply touches the uncertain datation of some scenes and considers relevance of the sources, which have served for the datation until today.