

The diploma thesis "The Question of Turkish Minority Integration in Germany During the Governing Period of the Black-Yellow Coalition 2009–2011" focuses on a widely discussed debate about the model of integration of the new coalition government CDU/CSU and FDP. The main purpose of the paper is to collect, analyse and interpret information about a current issue in Germany: social and cultural integration of the Turkish minority into the German mainstream culture. The topic is narrowed only to the first two years of the coalition project and focuses mainly on the events shortly before the final agreement and ends with the last occurrences in 2011. The main goal is to answer the main research question how the integration model of the current coalition changed and if there is a new strategy or continuity with the previous governments. The bodies which influence the long-term integration of this group are twofold: on one side are the German ministries and state institutions, on the other are Turkish representatives including those non-governmental organization that have their field of action within Germany. Apart from analysing the primary and secondary sources, expert interviews with relevant representatives of the institutions and distinct researchers will also be presented.
