

Bachelor thesis „Change in czech women’s opinions and attitudes towards family and reproductive behaviour“ is focused on qualitative research conducted among two generations of czech women. The research technique was half structured interview. Interviews were made with mother and daughter from one family, so the possible change in approach to family and reproductive strategies could be found. It was also possible to find out, where family patterns were transmitted from mother to daughter through socialization. Questions were split into three parts, the first one was focused on the family of origin, the second one on the procreative family and the third one has included questions about attitudes towards family as an institution. All daughters are currently college students, so college education was also examined in reference to planned life cycle. The gathered data were interpreted within the historical context. The education of mothers was influenced by communism, while girls have been growing up in democratic society.
