

Abstract

This bachelor thesis deals with a comparison of the british Labour Party Manifesto and the british Conservative Party Manifesto in the general elections of 2010. The thesis aims to describe general definition of a political party, historic development of its definition, minimal and special definition of a political party. The focus is also on division of political parties due to the organizational structure and the political parties typology in the scope of the left-right polarity. The last part of the first chapter deals with the political party manifests. The second chapter aims to analyze the Labour Party Manifesto 2010 and its subchapters represented by the introduction, rebuilding the economy, education, health, crime and immigration, families and older people, communities and creative Britain, a green recovery, democratic reform and a global future. There is a Conservative Manifesto 2010 analysis in the third chapter and it deals namely with its subchapters change the economy, change society, change politics, protect the environment and promote our national interest. There is a comparison of both of the manifests in the last chapter, including the evaluation of the real activity of the conservative government elected in 2010 in the foreign policy area. The bachelor thesis aims to discover differing and consensual areas in both of the documents and to draw a conclusion related to the foreign policy.