

Abstract

The bachelor's thesis "The Suez Crisis: Impacts on Great Britain's Policy and Development of the International Relations " focuses on the pivotal moments and consequences of one of the largest crises during the Cold War, the Suez Crisis, which took place in 1956. The focal point of this event was the Israeli attack on Egypt which was supported by Great Britain and France. The United States and the USSR also diplomatically entered the conflict, which ended up being the deciding factor in the entire situation. This thesis dissects the factors which led to the outbreak of the Suez Crisis, the crisis itself as well as its eventual consequences. The goal of the work is also to identify who eventually won and lost because of this conflict. Furthermore, the paper also discusses what effects the Suez crisis eventually had on Great Britain and what developments it meant in terms of the relationships between the main actors that played a role in the crisis.
