

The written work deals with the elections and electoral system in communist Czechoslovakia after 1968. The work compares the elections and electoral system, on the one hand, how it was proclaimed by the Communist Party and on the other hand, how the elections were done in reality. It shows that the democratic elections in Czechoslovakia, generally known as a democratic symbol of the people's will, had no right on this title.

The first part describes the Representative bodies, the parties and the party system of communist regime.

The main part is focused on the elections and electoral system, on the principles of electoral system and how these principles were broken.

The final part describes the extinction of mandate, the complementary elections and the polling programs.
