

Pastoral theology (poimenics) is directed toward communicative action in relation to the individual in a context with religious and spiritual care. The pragmatic theological discipline and application's primary objective and goal is to assist a person with illness in all situational human aspects to improve the contentment (i. e. well-being) on earth as best as we can. Pastoral theology is the continued reflection of the dimension in accordance with and in union with God.

Procedural poimenics include existential-analytic psychotherapy, which also operates in its fourth postulated existence with the spiritual motivation of the patient with medicine, which usually takes care of the physical and mental aspect of a person. However, patients with secondary mental disorders with known primary damage to the nervous system very often suffer as a result of unilateral or one-sided practices, unfortunately both in medicine and in an existential-analytic psychotherapy, where the three Fundamental existential motivators are about being on earth and the fourth being in spiritual space.

Spirituality according to theological dogmatism, which practically builds and continues spiritual care in its own activity, from the very beginning of all human nature, that is, from the first basic motivation by existential psychotherapy this aspect of their care completely ignored. The Christian dogma in its approach builds and combines poimenics which cares for the spiritual dimension of an individual with more sophisticated procedures in accordance with the opinion of the physician and takes into account the spiritual dimension of man in all aspects of the existential motivation according to EAL.
