

This thesis deals with the execution of social security benefits. The thesis is divided into six chapters, which are broken down into subsections. It also includes an introduction and a conclusion. The first chapter describes the batch system in the Czech Republic. After defining the concept of social security benefit, the principles are described in the provision of social security benefits and the breakdown of social security benefits. Furthermore, according to the systems of social security rights defined by individual social security benefits. The second section describes the types of executions. First, it discusses the judicial enforcement. In this section we describe two methods of enforcement, which by their nature are possible in execution of social security benefits. It is a payroll deductions and receivables commandments. Other subsections devoted to execution under the Enforcement Regulations, administrative execution, tax execution and parallel execution. The third chapter discusses the execution of health insurance benefits. Herein, the benefits of which can perform execution deductions from wages and benefits that can affect seizures. Further, it discusses the deviations in the implementation of deductions of health insurance benefits from the normal procedure for making payroll deductions. The fourth chapter is devoted to executions of pension benefits. The fifth chapter contains the issue of execution of state social support benefits and foster care. There is the historical development of legislation and then indicate which benefits are subject to execution. The sixth chapter discusses the issue of executions of benefits in material distress benefits provided to persons with disabilities and the care allowance. Further, it discusses the case of Chomutov, which took place in 2009. In this case were penalized executory cash being paid benefits in material distress.