In my diploma thesis I focus on the topic of public procurement, especially the modes of procurement. This issue is very topical mainly due to the existence of the new Law on Public Procurement which is currently in the middle of the legislative process.

In the very first I deal shortly with the history of regulation of public procurement. Further I think of the status of procurement law in the legal system and I also introduce the basic principles of public procurement including its application on small-scale public tenders. In chapter three I try to give brief overview of all modes which can be used in public procurement according to the current legislation. For each of them I concentrate on its specific characteristics and highlight the peculiarities that distinguish it from others. It is not my intention to submit precise instruction for the procedure under the Law on Public Procurement or exhaustively comment on the statutory provisions.

The most important chapter of the whole thesis is chapter four where I describe various innovations that will be brought by the new Law on Public Procurement which should apply soon. I focus on the most important changes and I compare them to the current legislation. As an example I introduce the procedure for innovation partnership as a new method of public procurement or brand new regulation called simplified regime.

For all the above I endeavor to use the case law and legislation as much as possible, especially in chapter three because I try to approach the reader and make him to understand the issue.
