

This paper deals with early children's spatial imagination. It is based on experiment focusing on children's tactile perception of spatial solids without visual check. Also the ability to communicate this perception to another person is observed. The paper is theoretically supported by constructivist ideas, it further draws mainly from Jirotkova and Littler's work, van Hiele's levels of geometrical thought and author's own teaching experience.